Journal Descriptive Title: Liberating Communities with my God-given Gifts

Date of Entry: August 25,2024

Lord, You Have Given Me the Responsibility to Liberate.

In different aspects of my life, I find myself using my skills in technology to assist others. Whether it's helping a friend fix a computer issue, developing a project to streamline processes, or volunteering my time to teach basic digital literacy, I see my abilities as a way to empower people. Technology can be a great equalizer, and I aim to use it to bridge gaps, whether in education, communication, or access to information.

When I am faced with a choice between helping a friend and someone who is less fortunate, I try to exercise wise judgment by considering who needs help the most and how my skills can have the greatest impact. If my friend is in need, I'll be there for them, but I also reflect on the broader impact of helping someone who may not have a support system at all. It's important for me to balance personal relationships with a broader sense of responsibility to those who are struggling on a larger scale, and I often ask myself how I can extend my talents to benefit both.

In IT, the opportunities to alleviate difficult situations are numerous. Whether it's building software that makes life easier for others or solving complex problems that have real-world implications, I aim to share my talents willingly.
